"The aim of this chapter is to engage with some conversations on 'otherness' in the hope that person-centred explorations of diversity can be enriched by widening the context for our thinking.

What follows is not a comprehensive or thorough survey; I am no student of philosophy. I am a person-centred practitioner who was introduced to the terrain of epistemology (the theory of knowledge) when I was a postgraduate student.

My question concerned why I found such a close 'fit' between person-centred values and living on retreat in a community dedicated to awareness of the 'Unity of Being': what can be said about experiencing two very different domains of knowledge as strikingly similar?

My journey as a student began with an exploration of the relationship between subjective experience and what counts as knowledge: the conversations that follow represent pebbles on the path that attracted my attention during the journey rather than a detailed map of the territory, and then are arranged together around the theme of how we think about 'the other'."

About Dot Clark

While on a long-term retreat 2008-9, I experienced a profound connection between mystical explorations of the unity of being and the fundamentals of the person-centred approach (PCA).

Both traditions call for a particular quality of attention to be paid to whatever is happening in relationship, with Other people and with Being itself. The territory discussed in my chapter was part of the exploration I undertook into the meaning of this experience while a student at the University of Edinburgh.
