Event Details

Living in a blame frame is part of our culture and our psyches, and we almost see it as normal and the truth. An intimation that it might not be so, and the cost of it, comes from a story from Malidoma Some, a Western-educated author and workshop leader from the Dagara tribe of West Africa. When he attempted to explain the Western concept of suing others for compensation to his village elders, they looked puzzled. After some time, one of them asked, "How then, do these people learn?" This is what we would like to explore.
