

JACKBOOT MEETS HAND: THE ASYMMETRICAL & PARADOXICAL
EXPERIENCE OF POWER
- SEBASTIAN HEID

onlineevents
Learning Together Online

RESOURCE GUIDE

ONLINEEVENTS CPD LIBRARY

- Watch Recordings
- Log Your Learning
- Download CPD Certificates

LOG IN OR JOIN TODAY

About Sebastian Heid

I am a person-centred counsellor with a passion for the philosophy of the person-centred approach. I was born and raised in Germany but have lived in England for over twenty years now.

I used to work in academia as a speech scientist with a PhD in Phonetics and Speech Communication, and then earned money as a software engineer. I live in the hope that my interest in philosophy, business experience and knowledge of, and experience with the person-centred approach will one day form a beautiful synergy.

I worked for the last two years on trying to make sense of the role of power in the lives of my clients and our culture in general, and the many varied philosophical approaches to make sense of it. I am in the process to find a way to condense my notes on the topic into a book.

onlinevents

Event Details

This conversation is part of a series titled:

Deconstructing power: What are we talking about when we talk about power?

A lot of people might have heard about a book by Reni Eddo-Lodge called:

"Why I'm No Longer Talking to White People About Race"

Intriguingly, this could easily be extended to a whole series:

- Why I'm no longer talking to men about sexism
- Why I'm no longer talking to cis people about gender
- Why I'm no longer talking to young/old people about age
- Why I'm no longer talking to rich people about money

Why do all these titles sound plausible? To me, it seems the underlying issue is that it is hard to talk to people who experience power differently. This is because I am a white, middle class, middle aged, educated man, i.e the typical person no-one wants to talk with about power. And, for a long time the way people talked about power just made no sense to me.

So, why is it so hard to talk about power?

Starting from my personal struggle with understanding power, I came to see three main stumbling blocks: the way power is experienced, the kind of stories we tell about power, and the way how challenging these stories challenges the way we think about ourselves.

The rough plan for the sessions is:

- Session 1: The devil and the detail - Why do we need to talk about power and what seems so hard about it
- Session 2: Jackboot meets hand - The asymmetrical & paradoxical experience of power
- Session 3: The power of narratives and the narratives of power
- Session 4: The chemistry of power - how its different aspects work together

The sessions are being recorded live as part of the onlinevents interview programme and will be able to view in the onlinevents CPD Library.

CLICK HERE FOR REPLAY OF SESSIONS

Reading

THE SUNDAY TIMES BESTSELLER

Reni Eddo-Lodge

WHY I'M NO LONGER TALKING TO WHITE PEOPLE ABOUT RACE

Includes a new chapter,
AFTERMATH

BLOOMSBURY

CLICK HERE FOR BOOK DETAILS

onlinevents

Connect with Onlinevents

John

/ Onlinevents

/ Onlinevents

Sandra

/ Onlinevents_saz

/ sandraonlinevents

www.onlinevents.co.uk

Find us on Facebook

Click HERE to join our FB group

Instagram