#GoingGlobal15

In his tireless efforts to bring peace to feuding groups, Carl R. Rogers, predicted that members of the world community will find that there are ways of being that do not involve power over others....that harmonious community can be built on.....mutual respect and enhanced personal growth (A Way of Being, 1980). Carl R. Rogers, was an influential American humanistic psychologist, and Nobel Peace Prize nominee. He developed client-centered therapy and searched for ways of being that are conducive to creating constructive change.

Toward that end, we invite you to join us in an international gathering devoted to creating a more compassionate future and finding personally and socially constructive ways through the chaos we face on this planet.

Each of us on this workshop facilitation team have experienced the potency of Rogers's transformational approach in large groups. It is a potency that allows each person to find their own unique way in this complex and interconnected world.

Some participants have described the experience as one that inspired them to live more authentically and compassionately, and empowered them to use their creativity to challenge prevailing social and political systems and structures.

The Learning Process in Large Groups

The diverse residential community will serve as a learning laboratory where we can better understand our use of power and control. Our personal, global and spiritual concerns, arise from the free-flowing turn of events rather than from an imposed agenda. The facilitators will have the role of learning partners, rather than experts. The carefully structured but undirected process will enhance participants' ability to suspend established ways of seeing, strengthen the courage to implement solutions to our runaway global crises, and nurture the seeds of social change.
